We've known for some time that the Toronto police, as well as the Canada Revenue Agency, are interested in the offshore financial dealings of the Liberal party's former chief fundraiser, and the businessman who introduced himself as Stephen Bronfman when he acquired Harold's Mailbox, the literary agency founded by Harold Abrahams. But while the sheer number of subpoenas and summonses issued to people and organizations linked to the Liberal Party in the past three years is now coming into the public record, we only have a minimal understanding of what happened. What is known is that, following an investigation by the Canada Revenue Agency

With its new feature, Facebook now joins a growing number of other social networks that offer the ability to make voice calls to other users. And in this age of mobile Internet, the voice calling feature also builds on Facebook's growing emphasis on mobile Internet as a primary means of communication. There are some key differences between Facebook's voice calling feature and the voice calling feature of other social networks. For one, you can only call other Facebook members by entering their phone numbers as contacts. For another, you can't call multiple people simultaneously by entering multiple phone numbers and instead have to wait for the call to go out to all numbers at once. Facebook's voice calling feature uses the same technology as many of its social network features like messaging. In a phone call, a user enters their phone number in a URL address bar, and Facebook then makes the actual phone call. That's done with an API developed by Facebook that includes the ability to broadcast calls to multiple friends at the same time. The API accesses the phone numbers of the recipients on Facebook's servers, possibly through a service like Twilio. Facebook's voice calling feature also has the ability to save the call for future listening. Facebook also offers other "hidden" features, such as the ability to block a number, mute a number, and leave a message when no one answers. The social network has been teasing the voice calling feature for the last two weeks, and the most recent version of its social network iOS app brought the feature with it. Facebook users who already have a phone number are more likely to use the service than those who don't. It's possible that Facebook is trying to coax Facebook users who don't yet have a phone number into buying one so that they can get the service. Facebook is offering the service via the same mobile phone carriers that offer texting and voice calling services, and it 3ef4e8ef8d
