The amendment was passed by lawmakers in September and had been due to come into effect on Saturday. However, Germany’s Constitutional Court deemed it unconstitutional and it was blocked from being applied. The court based this decision on the fact that it ruled in the case of H. v K. in 2017, in which it determined that state institutions were not permitted to pay fathers of children with special needs more money than the mothers. In that case, a woman sued after her partner left her before the birth of their second child. The mother demanded that she be designated as the primary caregiver, which would have allowed her to receive extra allowances. The court ruled that the government was allowed to pay for the extra child-care costs because the care of children with special needs is not a state responsibility. While this ruling seemed to provide plenty of breathing room for the states to begin implementing the new payments, it was clear from the 3ef4e8ef8d
