Key Features: - Protects your PC, network, online activities and your .Q: Expected number of moves needed to get to certain position Suppose we have a balanced $n \times n$ board with 1 's and 0 's and we move a single 1 through the board without flipping any 0 's. For example, the board below is balanced. Is it true that for any position of the board there is a unique path to it through the board? If so, how many moves are needed to reach a position from an arbitrary starting position? A: If you only move a single 1 , the number of positions you can reach in k moves is 2^k . To see this, start with a single 1 , and then place the first 1 in one of the k cells on the left side of the board. This is clearly a valid path. Now, just mirror the rest of the board. A: This is an interesting problem. For simplicity, suppose that the $n \times n$ board has only two colours: red and blue, and we want to move a blue unit from the origin to the point (i, j) . We need to prove that there is a unique sequence of moves to get to (i, j) starting from the origin and using only red moves. Let P be the sequence of moves we need. By definition of "red move" we know that P is either: a sequence of red moves, or a sequence of blue moves followed by a sequence of red moves. Notice that if the sequence of moves P starts with a blue move, then the sequence P' where we reverse the order is also a valid sequence. Notice also that if P' begins with a sequence of red moves, then this sequence can be reverse (this is because a blue move must always be followed by a red move). Therefore, we only have to consider the case where P is a sequence of red moves. Let D be the maximum value of $|P|$. Notice that D cannot be more than n because we can get
