Field of the Invention The present invention relates to electrical contact systems and methods, and more particularly to such systems and methods which utilize a plurality of contacts in order to have a greater reliability and reduce the possibility of malfunction of the system. 2. Description of the Prior Art Electrical contacts are used to transmit electrical signals from one electrical apparatus to another. A common problem with electrical contacts is that they can fail to completely close and open when a signal is transmitted or received, respectively. Such a failure is referred to as a "hot open" or a "cold open". If such a failure occurs, it is possible that the contact can cause damage to the other elements in the apparatus through which the signal is being transmitted. For example, if a contact were to fail to fully close, the possibility exists that it may come into contact with some other element in the apparatus and cause damage to the apparatus. If a contact were to fail to fully open, the possibility exists that the opening could be of sufficient size to allow arcing to occur. Such arcing could result in damage to other elements within the apparatus. It is possible that this damage could be so serious as to render the entire apparatus inoperable. As a result of this potential for damage, a number of methods have been devised to detect when a contact has failed to close or open, and to then shut off the apparatus using such a failure. These methods are known as "alarm systems".
