Wayne Thiebaud Wayne Thiebaud (born Wayne Robert Scott Thiebaud; March 12, 1943) is an American artist and designer best known for his work in comic book art, comic book lettering, and illustration. Early life Born in St. Louis, Missouri, Thiebaud first learned to draw as a child from his brother, Jeff. He received a degree in physics from Purdue University and served in the United States Air Force, where he was assigned to the 8th Air Force. He transferred to study architecture at Washington University in St. Louis, but decided that the "arts" had more to offer. While in St. Louis, he worked as an illustrator for the Saint Louis Star newspaper. In his junior year at Washington University, he won the prestigious Prix de Rome, a prestigious award for young artists. He went to Rome for a year, then to Florence to study at the Institute of Fine Arts. He later returned to the United States to work for the publisher Dutton and to start his own career. Career Thiebaud worked on a variety of projects, including the 1988 graphic novel The Stupids! by Michael Dooley, through which he met writer and director of The Stupids! Mike Nichols. Thiebaud began working on the comics industry as a letterer, but he soon went on to become an artist for Marvel Comics. There he was employed for a time as an artist, letterer, and later a plotter. He was able to advance through the ranks, eventually becoming the assistant to Archie Goodwin. Thiebaud became the lead artist on Marvel Comics' The Tomb of Dracula in 1988, which debuted in Marvel Graphic Novel #4. He continued on as a lead artist on various Spider-Man series, as well as on The Tomb of Dracula, Night of the Living Dead and Planet of the Apes. He drew for Marvel Comics a number of separate comic book series, including The Tomb of Dracula, Night of the Living Dead, The Shroud of Ghastly Horror, Alien Worlds 2d92ce491b
