A: The physical memory that the running program uses is allocated by the operating system, you can't control it. The memory that the program uses is decided by the computer processor itself, both the operating system and the application. If you can understand the details of the operating system and the way the application is programmed it might be a good exercise to try and control how much memory an app needs. In the past your computer (and most other UNIX-like OS's) allocated memory in units of kilobytes. The operating system would check the memory usage of all the programs in the system and decide how many kilobytes they would each get. Some computer and OS's ran out of space and had to turn off some process. I'm not sure why Windows allocates memory in 'pages'. If the computer has enough memory and you can save and load a file while doing the programming you may not be able to detect the memory allocation used by the running application. In that case you'd need to run the app in a profiler (a program that uses tools such as valgrind to monitor how much memory the application is consuming). Most profilers will allocate a bit of the memory they use to watch the memory space of the running app, report on usage and access patterns, measure performance, and give graphs. You can see the memory statistics for a running app using taskman, from the command line, or TaskMgr in Windows. There are a lot of other tools and even GUIs and they all have different features. For general overviews and apps with features that might be of interest take a look at this SO question. And for more detailed explanations and links to related SO questions you can try this. "I'm so sick of defending this country," he said. "When are we gonna take a good look at ourselves?"
