I would be interested in PHP but I don't know what would be the best one. I have a tool that would accept XML documents (and that I would want to accept in the future) and would create new documents from those. I would want to do some data storage on the server end. Would it be better to use a specialized CMS language? A: You can use any language that suits your requirements, and in your case it is XML, so the language is not important here. I would go for PHP though, because: PHP is a web scripting language You will most likely use your CMS on the web, so PHP will suit this requirement. You will learn something new. The downside of PHP is that it is "weak" and not very secure, which means you should make sure you implement the security aspects properly. Q: MacRuby and Safari's font feature differences I've got a MacRuby app and I'd like to create a link to a site that has a font feature called text shadow. I've got a bit of Ruby script that generates a styled link with a 'text-shadow' CSS property and for some reason it's different in Safari than Firefox or Chrome. In Safari, the text shadow isn't displayed at all, even though the page says the text has a text-shadow. The Chrome and Firefox behave as expected. I've tried all the various possible combinations of the link in different browsers and the text-shadow is always missing in Safari. I've
