solution.Bilateral metatarsophalangeal joint hypermobility in a large cohort of Chinese patients with idiopathic toe walking. The study aims to investigate the incidence and severity of metatarsophalangeal joint hypermobility in Chinese toe walking patients. This is a retrospective case series. A total of 237 consecutive patients with idiopathic toe walking underwent both clinical and metatarsophalangeal joint passive range of motion (PROM) measurements by a single observer. We calculated the percentage of patients with bilateral and unilateral metatarsophalangeal joint hypermobility. Also, the severity of toe walking in these patients was compared. Three hundred feet of 237 patients (13.4%) showed bilateral metatarsophalangeal joint hypermobility, whereas only two patients (0.8%) showed bilateral metatarsophalangeal joint hypomobility. All patients with bilateral metatarsophalangeal joint hypermobility had moderate-to-severe toe walking (P Adoption of modern food technologies in diets of developing countries.
