Conditions surrounding the start and future of the 2015 Panama Canal expansion project are taking on greater importance as the issue remains unresolved almost six months after being raised in the bilateral discussion between President Barack Obama and President Juan Carlos Varela of Panama. The canal, which is owned by Panama, is operated for the international community as the Panama Canal Authority. As discussed in an article by Francisco Casal in The Daily Graphic in January, the politicians in both countries worked on the Panama deal for years. Negotiations resumed in July, ending with the signing of the Panama Canal Treaties Act in January. But work began in 2011, several months after the signing of the treaties, for the expansion and for the canal's maintenance and operation. The expansion would include greatly increasing the size of the canal, increasing locks and maintaining a deeper depth. The project would be completed by 2015. The new locks would have a capacity of 16 mega-meter ships, which is nearly 3,000 feet. The existing canal's capacity is about 8,000 feet. The expansion is expected to nearly double the size of the canal and will cost $5.25 billion. There are major questions about the costs and whether Panama can pay for the expansion. The canal needs major rehabilitation, but there's no question that the expansion would greatly increase the canal's operation. The canal's capacity would be increased, and the widening of the channel would produce greater depth. One
