Adenoid cystic carcinoma (ACC) is a rare type of breast cancer, and the exact pathogenesis is unknown. Histopathologically, ACC shows follicular keratinization with the infilteration of inflammatory cells, resulting in the characteristic histologic appearance of ACC. In this study, we sought to find whether the presence of follicular keratinization was associated with the expression of human epidermal growth factor receptor 2 (HER2), estrogen receptor (ER), and progesterone receptor (PR) in ACC, which has been reported in only one previous study. We observed follicular keratinization in 11.3% of ACC and performed immunohistochemical staining for HER2, ER, and PR. The expression of HER2, ER, and PR was significantly correlated with the presence of follicular keratinization ($P = 0.0001$, $P = 0.02$, and $P = 0.009$, respectively), and follicular keratinization was significantly associated with the expression of HER2, ER, and PR. The stage of disease was not correlated with the presence of follicular keratinization ($P = 0.21$) or the expression of HER2 ($P = 0.41$), ER ($P = 0.96$), or PR ($P = 0.85$). These results indicated that follicular keratinization might be associated with the activation of steroid hormones in ACC, and further studies are needed to elucidate the functional significance of follicular keratinization in breast carcinogenesis.How To Personalize Your Digital Life People are using their digital lives in many ways, for many reasons and for many purposes.
