What's New in the?

Consider a driver, say Arvind Singhal, vice president of product management and evangelism at Google. He's recently downloaded a new app called Glancee from the Play Store and set out to do an experiment. He had a bunch of drivers with GPS sensors loaded with the latest version of Glancee, and he made an informed guess about where they had been. What he ended up seeing was a series of tiny markers, each showing a short burst of data. Those would correspond to the little windows within the app where the driver would have checked his phone. He also saw a dot on the street that followed the driver, where that driver had popped up Glancee's app and cleared out his data cache. Singhal quickly decided that Glancee could be used as a tool for better understand and manage the data drivers leave behind after completing a ride. If a driver is off-route or not using his phone, Glancee could recognize it and take note of that. It could also recognize when the phone was in fact in a car and send the data to Google. But that's just the starting point. If you could, for instance, give the company a license to collect all that driver data, Google could come up with algorithms that could predict where drivers go without them even knowing. It could do that for individual drivers or for groups of them. You could get a lot of value from a company like that. Of course, the drivers would be able to opt out of that. They could block tracking and force Google to make a promise not to share their data or sell it. But, Singhal said, "Google is a big company, and they have a lot of money." Google isn't likely to give drivers a choice. There is also the question of driver privacy. Uber claims that an app like this, given access to that data, would not violate a person's right to privacy, but that might not be enough to change some app developers' minds. For instance, what if you could use that data to show where the drivers who are most similar to yours are spending their time, so you could find out whether they're sleeping or having sex? Such potential uses might offend some people. There's also the question of driver's bias or racism. We're seeing an increasing number of incidents in which drivers have targeted minorities. And the data someone
